

SIMONE LANZENSTIEL

›somewhere around here – about this close‹

Exhibition: December 10, 2010 – January 22, 2011

Simone Lanzenstiel is well known for her interventions and actions in public and private spaces. Spontaneously, she reacts to architectural details, picking up on various building elements - marks or relics such as cables and pipes - and transposes them into painting. A stay in New York, and her move to Berlin last year have inspired her: details of her new surroundings, such as cryptic scribbles or graffiti sprayed onto weathered walls, are incorporated into her pictures, and formulated in paint through a methodical process.

We are showing the latest canvases from this year. Thin, white ground makes it possible to see the weave of the canvases at times, as it runs down the surface in transparent streaks. Layers of white in diverse tones occasionally condense in patches, resulting in dribbles of paint. Colorful, arcing, and curving lines are broken up, painted over in white, and seem to vanish. Dark red, luminous blue, or pink nuances give the works a sense of rhythm; soft at times, mere indications at others, these subtle touches are occasionally intensified, becoming powerful accents. Lanzenstiel's new paintings are persuasive in their balance and ease. Ephemeral-looking, but precise sedimentary layers are woven into an intriguing visual texture.

The canvases alternate with smaller works on MDF or layered chipboard, which are also rendered in acrylic and spray-on enamel. Traces of usage and damaged spots along the edges enhance the object-like character of the image supports, so that some even seem like found objects. Painted slats of different lengths are leaned up against the walls or jammed between the ceiling and floor, interfering with the self-referential quality of the paintings' surface planes. Lines wander out of the canvases to become independent drawings in space.
